The lignite, as did the wood of which it is composed, contains a certain amount of resinous matter, and the secret of the pressing of the lignite into briquettes, and its cohesion in that form, is this very resin which is contained in the raw material. The pressure upon the surface of the lignite when in the press is enormous, and develops considerable heat, so much so that the hand can hardly support that of a newly-made briquette. Supposing, for instance, that absolutely dry lignite were sent into the press, the result would be that the heat developed would be so intense as to carbonise the resin in the lignite, and consequently the briquette would have no resistance but would crumble of itself to pieces. In order to obviate this, and to obtain a hard compact briquette, it has been proved by numerous experiments that the lignite, as it enters the press, must contain 18 per cent, of water, and that this amount is sufficient to prevent the carbonisation of the natural resin, and allows the development of just sufficient heat to permit of the resin becoming sticky, and this, combined with the force of the blow, forms a solid briquette with a polished surface, which does not soil the hands and which is not easily broken. A constant stream of water is kept in circulation around the press so as to keep it as cool as...
