Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: .notice of the events which connect the lesson with the preceding one. This introduction might be profitably committed to the most advanced scholars, to prepare a short paper upon it, to be first submitted to the teacher for correction, and afterwards read by him to the class. This would have an improving effect upon the writers, and act as a stimulus to the other members of the class; there are several reasons, however, that induce us to recommend that the scholars should only in this manner take up the New Testament lessons. The next step will be the reading of the lesson; this the teacher will do well to commence, and take his turn with the scholars throughout. The moral effect of this will be good, and it will have a favourable influence on the reading of the class. The ability to read well is very desirable, though it has been too often neglected; the teachers of senior classes will do well to pay particular attention to it, seeking to secure a correct pronunciation, a natural tone of voice, and suitable expression. It is a good plan for each to read to a full stop, or till the teacher directs the next scholar to commence. In reading over the lesson, the meaning of every phrase and of every important word should be made plain: this may be done by questioning the scholars and supplying information where it is needed. The meaning of words should be brought...
