Laurentius, in a great measure, adopted the anatomy and doctrines of Galen, relative to the nervous system. In his whole history of the brain, he says, I do not see that Galen has erred, except as to the plexus mirabilis, which in man is so small, as almost to escape the eye. With respect to the nature, uses, and distribution of the nerves, Laurentius very generally agrees with Galen. He says that the faculty of feeling and moving flows from the brain to the whole body by the nerves; but whether this faculty alone flows, or with it something corporeal, admits of dispute. He says that the nerves have no perceivable cavities, but that their substance is fistulous and spongy; yet he thinks it possible that the animal spirit, which is the most subtle of all things,...
