By a Motor Nerve is to be understood the thread of communication between the automatic or nerve cell of the centre and its muscular end-process (85). When a stimulus is applied to the centre of the given nerve, the transmitted impulse gives rise to a muscular contraction (87). The velocity of sensory impulses in man has not yet been well determined. In most cases the velocity of the impulses is retarded by cold and accelerated by heat. As yet, experiments have not shown that a purely motor trunk may act as a sensory trunk, and vice versa. 381. The Cranial Nerves pass from the central nervous system (the pons and medulla, principally) outward by openings in the skull.
